Introduction

The activity plan is divided into three sections: research, education, interaction with agencies and civil society. The former headline "International" has been incorporated into the other sections, mainly the section on research. During 2017, the Centre's activities since its establishment will be evaluated.

Research

During 2017, the Centre's director and deputy director will write at least three publications each, about police-related subjects. By 2017, the Centre's deputy director will investigate in particular self-radicalization and political violence (external research funding has been obtained). In 2017, the Centre's director will conduct research in particular on the regulation of surveillance (external research funding has been obtained). In 2017, another application will be made for research funding to the Riksbank's anniversary fund and the Swedish Research Council. The Centre's continued participation in funding the Nordic Journal of Police Law will be decided at a board meeting in 2017.

Education

The Centre's Director and Deputy Director will continue to teach masters courses at the Faculties of, respectively, Law and History. A proposal for an interdisciplinary master's degree program in "social conflicts" will be presented during the spring term of 2017.

Interaction with agencies and civil society.

One aspect of the Centre's work is to encourage collaboration across institutional and faculty boundaries regarding police-relevant research. A number of research seminars with interdisciplinary themes will be arranged in 2017, about three per semester. During the autumn, a half-day conference is planned on the theme "Perspectives on the 2015 police reform". The Centre's Director and Deputy Director plan to hold lectures or otherwise participate in a number of national and international conferences. The Director and Deputy Director shall continue to participate in various advisory capacities to administrative agencies, and in drafting official commentary on legislative proposals.
